About the Shadow Warrior Project

The Shadow Warriors Project was created by Mark Geist, a private security contractor, who was injured saving Americans' lives in 2012. His injuries prevented him from being able to return to work, which made it difficult to provide for his family. Because of the "red tape," financial struggles, and little to no support for the men in this line of work, he was passionate about finding a way to help ease the load from already heavy shoulders.

Shadow Warriors Project is a foundation dedicated to the support of private military security contractors, conducting paramilitary security operations in some of the world's most dangerous areas. It is the only charity of its kind. Although the private security contractor has served in the military he is considered a civilian and does not receive the same support offered to injured active military or veterans. We are here to serve the private security contractor by offering financial support through heartfelt donations. By easing the load of these injured warriors it allows them to focus on healing, as an individual as well as the family unit.

Mark's experience in Benghazi is documented in the book and movie titled 13 Hours.
